1. Help you practice for your next tasks

Having model papers and learning formatting and new methods is a whole exercise in itself. This is an exclusive kind of learning where you struggle to understand different parts and segments of a paper. You come to know what you should include and what you should exclude.

2. Shows you a pathway

Of course, model papers provide you a direction of what you should begin with and where you should end. You will not have to spend a lot of time figuring out what I should write first.

3. Help you to study the writing task more comprehensively

When studying a model paper you begin to think about what other possible content you may include. You learn to think about things outside the box.

4. It helps you stand out and become a competent candidate

Assuming a format and doing it on your own is a good thing but it takes time for such a format to develop and that way you may lose scores. But following a model paper will allow you to think more about content development.

5. You come to know about your strengths and weaknesses

Once you start writing you get familiar with different parts of the format. You come to know which segment you can do better and which is difficult for you.

6. Identify mistakes or silly mistakes

While writing on your own you may not get enough time to identify the silly mistakes you make while writing your paper. However, model time will help you save some time and proof-read your paper several times.

7. Helps you develop stamina for writing a similar paper in future

Once you are done writing a paper, it will become easier for you to write a similar paper in an even lesser time future. You will already have a lot of ideas about writing it and you will end up making it better than the previous task.

8. Helps you find strategies to encounter the task

You become familiar with the format and you get smarter. You learn to find tips and tricks to encounter your task.

9. Prepares you to compete in mind games

Well, things might be differently explained to you, however, they are simple and manageable if understood properly. You will learn those are just the mind games that your professor or examiner is playing with you.

10. Keeps you updated

As time passes, new formats and structures for different essay types are introduced and it is very important to stay updated. Because the more updated the model or sample paper is the more the task will become easier for you to high quality papers.
